New ODIHR guidelines to improve access to healthcare and housing for Roma and Sinti communities presented in Warsaw

Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe

According to Daniel Radulescu of Sastipen, "Roma and Sinti communities continue to experience inequalities in accessing healthcare services, and often face stereotyping by healthcare workers and even segregation". To address this issue, the OSCE's

ODIHR office has released a set of guidelines to help civil society with identifying ways to ensure Roma get the healthcare they have a right to.

Integrating the social determinants of health into health workforce education and training

World Health Organization

It is no secret that our health is dictated by much more than just the health systems we live in and make use of. Non-medical or social causes, often named the 'social determinants of health' have a profound impact on our health, yet understanding of this is often lacking among both healthcare workers and patients. This report by the WHO makes the case for why social and healthcare workers should have a better grasp of this concept to ensure effective support. It also provides methods on how this can be achieved

The 2023 report of the Lancet Countdown on health and climate change: the imperative for a health-centred response in a world facing irreversible harms

The Lancet

The Lancet Countdown is an international research collaboration that independently monitors the evolving impacts of climate change on health, and the emerging health opportunities of climate action. In its eighth iteration, this 2023 report highlights that seizing the opportunity to secure a healthier future has never been more vital. Ensuring that a thriving future remains in reach will require the coordinated action of health professionals, policy makers, corporations, and financial institutions.

Tackling racism in maternal care

BMJ

Inequalities in maternal health outcomes for ethnic minority and Indigenous populations across the globe are driven by cultural, structural, and interpersonal racism. Strategies to mitigate this racial injustice require government commitment, structural policy changes, and community led solutions. Biomedically driven interventions alone will not fix this, and novel systemic approaches are required to tackle the social determinants.

Time to treat the climate and nature crisis as one indivisible global health emergency

The Lancet

Over 200 health journals call on the UN, political leaders, and health professionals to recognise that climate change and biodiversity loss are one indivisible crisis and must be tackled together to preserve health and avoid catastrophe. This overall environmental crisis is now so severe as to be a global health emergency.

The double discrimination faced by women with disabilities

Euractiv

The discussions on the European Disability Card are currently taking place in the European Parliament's FEMM committee. One point they warned about is the lack of awareness on double discrimination faced by women with disabilities. Though the Card is a great step in the right direction, it remains crucial to be aware of certain groups that may fall through the cracks because of intersectional discrimination.

Letter: Breaking the vicious circle of poor housing and poor health

The Guardian

In a letter to the Guardian, the Association of Directors of Public Health call attention the crucial consideration of housing for health. Improving housing takes effort, and a local effort should be strongly complemented by a national effort as well, while also keeping the strong influence of poverty in mind. This requires a perspective which moves beyond just the health space, and into housing policy and other forms of policy as well.
